INTRODUCTION

I am a master's student in National Development at National Taiwan University. My research asks how the state governs through organizations at arm's length: why governments create administrative corporations and government-endowed foundations, how these bodies change over time, and why some of them become contested.

My current projects approach this question from theory and practice. An NSTC project compares institutional change across quasi-governmental organizations, while two commissioned studies show how such bodies are designed: a feasibility assessment for an occupational accident center and the personnel and pay systems of the National Institute of Traditional Chinese Medicine. I also work on energy security, and on how the Japanese and Korean legislatures discuss climate loss and damage.

My training is in public administration. Survey work at a public opinion research center, internships in city government and at an environmental law NGO, and two years on university councils taught me how policy is made, and measured, in practice.
