INTRODUCTION

I am a master's student at the Graduate Institute of National Development, National Taiwan University. I am interested in how public institutions govern emerging technologies and how citizens take part in decisions about them. Drawing on deliberative democracy, my thesis will examine how members of the public, selected through sampling and brought together in a citizen deliberation, reason through the ethical and governance questions raised by prenatal and neonatal genetic testing in the era of next-generation sequencing.

Beyond the thesis, I study the organizational forms through which the state acts. A National Science and Technology Council (NSTC) project compares institutional change and controversy in administrative corporations and government-endowed foundations. Two commissioned studies, one on whether the Center for Occupational Accident Prevention and Rehabilitation should become an administrative corporation and one on personnel and pay systems for the National Institute of Traditional Chinese Medicine, show how such bodies take shape in practice. I also contribute to an NSTC project on energy security and regional cooperation under geopolitical risk, and I use quantitative text analysis to compare how the Japanese and South Korean legislatures debate climate loss and damage.
