INTRODUCTION

I am a master's student at the Graduate Institute of National Development, National Taiwan University, interested in how public institutions govern emerging technologies and how citizens take part in those decisions. Taking a deliberative democracy perspective, my thesis will analyze how sampled members of the general public, brought together in a citizen deliberation, reason through the ethical and governance questions raised by prenatal and neonatal genetic testing in the next-generation sequencing era.

Beyond the thesis, I study the organizational forms through which the state acts. An NSTC project compares institutional change and controversy in administrative corporations and government-endowed foundations, while two commissioned studies, a feasibility assessment for the Center for Occupational Accident Prevention and Rehabilitation and the design of personnel and pay systems for the National Institute of Traditional Chinese Medicine, show how such bodies are designed in practice. I also work on an NSTC project on energy security and regional cooperation under geopolitics, and use quantitative text analysis to compare how the Japanese and Korean legislatures debate climate loss and damage.
